GERMANS GOT NO INKLING OF FRENCH PLAN.

This work was carried out and the secret was kept so well that to all appearances the Germans never had an inkling of what was in prospect. Furthermore, they evidently believed the chergies of the French were being absorbed by the battle of the Somme, and made no preparations to meet a thrust at Verdun. Thus It came about that what was intended for a small manoeuvre became a brilliant tactical

The attack was planned for ten days ago. Artillery began preliminary work, but rainy weather set in and grand headquarters ordered a postponement. When the time came, the attack was delivered by four columns of a division each, first on the left, between the southern slopes of Pepper Hill and Thiaumont Farm. This met with little difficulty. The attackers carried Thiaumont Work and Farm and the Haudrement Quarries set as the objective, and gained the Bras-Douaumont Road beyond. There the attackers stopped, having

Hill 320 was rushed by troops from Fleury which approached Caillette Wood through the celebrated "Ravine of Death." They then crossed the wood and reached the approaches to Douaumont Fort. Everywhere the Germans gave way before them. But the garrison of the fort hurriedly prepared to defend the important point confided to it. French troops surrounded the fort and extended their gains everywhere without an instant's delay. Fatigue parties set to work, turning the defenses so as to be ready to resist counter-attacks.

West of the fort the village of Douaumont had been carried at a run and passed beyond. Meanwhile a stiff struggle went on between the French and the defenders of the fort. The Germans refused to surrender and the French killed nearly all of them before they forced their way into the ruins.

Things went equally well on the right. The third column advanced half a mile, reaching the edge of Vaux-Chaplire Wood still held by the enemy as well as Fumin Wood. The column stopped north of these woods on the outskirts of the village of Vaux.
